

Music To Listen To

Contributed by William Renner
Tuesday, 29 August 2006

There are more and more ways to find great music to listen to today, and your options for how you listen to that music are growing. The Internet is full of great music, much of which is the same stuff you can find in your local music store. Before the Internet, you had to buy your music from a music store, and quite often, you had to buy the whole album. After a while, singles were released, but there was no guarantee that you could find the single you wanted.

Now, you can download music to listen to on a variety of sites. You still have to pay for it, but for the most part, you can choose the exact song you want without having to purchase the entire album. You can choose a random variety of songs and download them to your computer. After that, you simply burn the songs to a CD or download them into your MP3 player. This way, you have more control over what music you want to listen to.

You can keep your music right on your computer if you wish. When you are craving some music to listen to, it is as easy as opening on of the many music players on your computer. You can use Real Player, QuickTime, Windows Media Player, or any other you may come across. On most computers, you don't even need a media player of any sort, you simply pop in the CD and a control panel will pop up.

If you have an older computer, you might want to play music when you aren't doing anything else on your computer. When you open your media player, and choose your music to listen to, you may find that everything else on your computer will drag. This may also cause your music to skip and stutter. This usually doesn't happen with newer computers, but you never know. If your music is skipping, or your computer is lagging, you are doing too much at once.

When choosing music to listen to, don't forget that the music store is still out there. It is very easy to get your music online, but sometimes, it's fun to go buy an album. Many times you may like one song from a CD, but you haven't heard the rest. You may be surprised to find there are many songs on that CD that you will fall in lovewith instantly. There is still something magical about browsing through a music store and finding something amazing.